In roughly 30 minutes of remarks in the Rose Garden at the White House on Tuesday afternoon, Obama asserted that, yes, he had made progress on his agenda, and, yes, the GOP-controlled Congress had dragged its feet and stalled his priorities. But he also sought to reframe the debate in the ways it would be waged going forward, arguing that the success of 2013 is "restoring America's standing in the world" and that "we need to respect each other" as the nation reels from a string of mass shootings. "It's very easy to forget that we have a failing health care system and we need to fix it," the president said. "It's very easy to forget that we have a failing immigration system and we need to fix it." The president then turned his attention to what he called the 3da54e8ca3
