They either start with a simple image that looks like a solid color, such as a t-shirt, or have it surrounded by a frame, such as a picture frame. An image usually has a background, which is the light-colored or transparent area that surrounds the photograph. It may be darkened to make the background prominent. This is referred to as Black Threshold. Then there are Layers. A layer can be thought of as a square of negative space. The image is layered on top of this layer, so it is like the print itself, and it's behind all of the other layers that make the image up. Sometimes an image has a number of layers, usually a title (explained more in Adding New Layers to an Image), a background, and additional layers. Figure 2.2 outlines a simple image. It has a title, a background, and an additional layer. Figure 2.2: An outlined image with a title, a black background, and an additional layer. The layers in an image are numbered by roman numerals, as shown in Figure 2.3. This example shows that layer 1 is the first layer that appeared when the image was opened. Layer 2 is the title layer, layer 3 is the background layer, and layer 4 is the additional layer. Figure 2

Q: How to add functionalities on two buttons? I would like to add a functionality to two buttons. That is, only one button can be clicked at a time (A if one is clicked, B if B is clicked, etc.), while if one is clicked, the other button is disabled. A: You can use the `setEnabled(true)` and `setEnabled(false)` methods. E.g. `button1.setEnabled(true); button2.setEnabled(false); button1.setEnabled(false); button2.setEnabled(true);` A: For future reference, if you want to make it reusable, have a look at the standard Java enum, which would allow you to have a constant representing what combination of disabled states should be used for the buttons. `enum Disabled { A_ONLY(true), // no B is ever enabled A_B_D(true), // both A and B are always disabled B_ONLY(true), // only B is ever enabled B_A_D(true), // both B and A are always disabled private final boolean disabled; Disabled(boolean disabled) { this.disabled = disabled; } public boolean isDisabled() { return this.disabled; } }` Then you'd call `setEnabled(Disabled.A_ONLY.isDisabled())` to set up A_ONLY mode. `..5)=11##f)return#f my %subs = (# normal-case 'dq' => '\d+0x[a-fA-F0-9]+', 'up' => '\d+0x[A-F0-9]+', 'us' => '\d+0x[A-F0-9]+', 'ps' => '\d+0x[A-F0-9]+', 'pg`
