Pathology, pathology and clinical diagnosis]. In addition to the standard histological and immunocytochemical techniques, gastroscopy now permits the diagnosis of Helicobacter pylori infection. In the course of the past decade, especially in the course of gastric resection, the introduction of methods to determine the presence of Helicobacter pylori has resulted in important progress being made in both the detection of the bacterium and the characterization of gastritis. Gastritis can be defined as inflammation of the gastric mucosa. The aim of this paper was to discuss the relationship between biopsy-based histopathology and clinical diagnosis of gastritis. In addition, the role of Helicobacter pylori in the pathogenesis of gastritis and the potential influence of H. pylori eradication on the outcome of surgery for peptic ulcer disease are discussed. In the past decade, a shift occurred in the epidemiology of gastritis. In particular, there was a change in the predominance of H. pylori infection in the stomach. Despite this change, it is still very difficult to differentiate between gastritis of the antrum and the corpus. This differentiation is especially important in the context of duodenal ulcers; in this case, a distinction between acute or chronic gastritis in the antrum and the body of the stomach is required. According to the patient's history, a presumptive diagnosis of ulcer disease can also be made. A retrospective, single-center study compared two techniques to determine whether Helicobacter pylori infection was present
