(AP) — A Wichita-area professor of Korean studies said Thursday that South Korean Bishop Hyung Jin Moon's comments about President Barack Obama were "dangerous" for his nation and its long-standing ties with the United States. Hyung Jin Moon, the former head of the Unification movement in South Korea and once considered a presidential contender for his opposition to nuclear weapons, said in an interview posted online on Thursday that Mr. Obama is using his race to gain political advantage. He also said "those on his side are at risk of losing their lives." "That is dangerous," said Chad Carr, a Wichita State University professor who specializes in Korean studies. "The government and church leaders of South Korea are now trying to distance themselves from Moon. They don't think their stature in the United States will be eroded if they distance themselves." The South Korean government initially indicated after the Obama election that it was open to working with the U.S. government. But Mr. Moon, who died in 2008, has expressed views similar to those the Rev. Jesse Jackson and others have had about Mr. Obama's race. Mr. Moon's comments have angered the Obama administration, particularly given the current flare-up between the two nations over freedom of expression, which South Korea is threatening to cut off as part of its toughening stance on North Korea. The bishop's voice carried weight in his country for decades as he campaigned for nuclear disarmament. Mr. Moon's comments about Mr. Obama came in an interview with Father Andrew Yeh, a pastor in Seoul. Father Yeh posted the interview on his website this week, and the South Korean 6d1f23a050
