Serum lipid concentrations have been measured on a large sample (n = 2,462) of children of New Zealand Maori and European ancestries living in isolated communities. Blood samples were collected at birth and at 3, 5, 7, 9, 11, 13, and 15 years and a profile of serum lipid concentrations determined. The results of sex-stratified analyses indicated that at each age, serum lipids in Maori children were higher than in European children. The serum lipid level at each age in Maori and European children was similar at birth. However, the serum lipid levels in Maori children increased faster during early childhood in both sexes than those in European children. Adjustment for socio-economic status (SES) and, where appropriate, for physical activity levels had little effect on the results, suggesting that socioeconomic and physical activity factors may not influence serum lipid concentrations in the early years. However, adjustments for SES at 15 years substantially reduced the serum lipid concentration differences between the ethnic groups. Adjustment for adiposity, in the form of body mass index, did not affect the results. The data indicate that the Maori children's elevated serum lipids could reflect their genetic propensity to deposit more fat during childhood, or be a consequence of a different adaptive physiological response to the metabolic insults associated with physical inactivity.Hi All, I have a laptop whose BIOS has been corrupted and it is no longer recognised by Windows XP. I only have Ubuntu 6.10, can anyone suggest what I can do? I do have a USB hard disk, is that the best way to load Ubuntu? I have downloaded the instructions here: However, I am stuck c6a93da74d
