Formal training in a curriculum for basic dental education must encompass both the theory and practice of dentistry. The basic dental program should promote inquiry, experimentation, and knowledge acquisition through the use of creative approaches to problem-solving. In reality, however, the primary learning approach for most students is observational. The lack of a structured curriculum and the use of observational learning in a long term basic dental education program frequently lead to frustration, poor performance, and problems. For this reason, it is imperative that the curriculum include a defined method of evaluation. The current educational climate calls for an appraisal of the use of the basic dental program as well as the need to develop a method for evaluating dental students as complete educators. This article will address the method of evaluation presently used in the basic dental program and examine the literature on evaluation of other basic dental programs. The article concludes with implications for the future of the basic dental program. in a bankruptcy proceeding without court order. Whether this was justified is, however, a question, not answerable on the present record, that must await further
